Husker observers often overlook Luck

By Gary Brantz

Nebraska's kicking game has been surprisingly effective this year following the graduation of punter-placekicker Rich Sanger. Although Randy Lessman isn't leading the league in punting average, only 13 of his 36 punts have been returned for a total of 37 yards. Despite their inexperience, placekicker Mike Coyle and Al Eveland also have done well, totaling 58 of Nebraska's 346 points.

But one of the aspects of the kicking game that often is overlooked is placekick holding. At Nebraska, this duty is held by second-string quarterback Terry Luck.

Luck began holding last year at home games, when a knee injury kept him out of any live action. He continued the job this season while also being called on at quarterback.

A lot of precision and timing is involved in placekicking. Luck said he and the kickers work 10 minutes before and 10 minutes during practice every day to develop that precision. According to Luck, the coaches feel a kick must be off within 1.1 second after the ball has been snapped to avoid having it blocked.

Luck denies feeling any pressure in holding kicks, and said he is never aware of the rush.

"All I have to do is get the ball on the tee," he said. "I've only been hit once-last year against Colorado."

Two years ago a Sooner field goal beat Nebraska here, 17-14. Today the kicking game again could be the deciding factor.
