

Pottery molds career

School hadn't prepared Gretchen Imler for a career, so she went looking for adventure and found it. And an occupation as well.

She's a potter.

"In school I was just taking pottery as a class, not looking forward to a career," Imler said. "When I got out of school, I found I wasn't prepared to make a living and I panicked. So I went looking for adventure."

She now has a studio in the Haymarket Art Gallery where she teaches pottery classes.

The Haymarket will show her work, which includes about 200 items, Sunday through Christmas. She'll show pitchers, cups, teapots, bowls, planters, vases, bottles and whistles.

After a short sojourn in Minnesota as a camp counselor, she hitchhiked alone to Alaska. She first worked as a typist, then helped emotionally disturbed children. Finally she got a job on a small fishing boat.

She spent the summer fishing for salmon and halibut in Cook Inlet and living on the beach.

"The most exciting thing is that it was directly connected with how I was going to live. I was a food producer," Imler said.

"All the time I was going to school," she continued, "I was never thinking about what's vital—food, or a career. I didn't know anything about anything. School prepared me to go to school some more, not any direct means of making a living."

Now that she considers pottery as her occupation she wants to learn automobile mechanics.

"Artists are the parasites of society," she said, quoting "Old Jules" by Marie Sandoz. "Nobody needs to buy a pot, or a book."

Factories can make a good functional pot, she said. "You don't need a potter."

Imler is now living in Brownville, making pots in her rented 19th century house, which doesn't have modern plumbing. A lean-to added on houses her pottery workshop and a kiln.

Being without indoor plumbing leaves her "in a continuous state of clay," Imler said.
