

$1 million cut

"The GSA is concerned that the cut will reflect a reduction in the number of graduate assistants that will be hired next year," Hill said. He estimated that about 100 graduate assistantships could possibly be eliminated.

Graduate assistant jobs must be renewed by the university every year, Hill said, and they usually are the first to bear the brunt of budget reductions.

"It is very unlikely that any faculty members would be cut," he said.

Fewer graduate assistants

Richard Lonsdale, UNL Geography Dept. chairman, said the only place his department could cut costs is in the number of graduate assistants it hires.

"When you are trying to maintain a quality graduate assistant program, cuts really hurt," he said.

Chairman of the UNL Chemistry Dept., Henry Baumgarten, said although he has not been told to cut back on graduate assistants, any such attempt would be "a futile gesture."

"To the extent that we have to cut back graduate assistants, we will have to cut back chemistry labs or increase the student-graduate assistant ratio," he said.
