Landscaping for library

A landscaping idea used nowhere else on campus will surround the new Love Library addition, according to Jay Thody, UNL assistant director of grounds. Berms, or dirt piles contoured to produce a hilly effect, will be placed on the east, west and north sides of the library addition when construction is completed, Thody said.

Native grasses planted in limestone ledge rock formations around the berms will help prevent erosion as well as provide a natural look in the area, he said.

The library grounds are receiving special landscaping because they are near the center of campus and are one of the first things a person sees when walking onto campus, Thody said.

"But our primary consideration is pedestrian traffic," he said. "Sidewalks providing students with the shortest possible distance between buildings will be the first completed stage of the project."

Approximately 50 shade and ornamental trees will be planted and an underground sprinkler system installed this fall and winter with remaining shrubs and grasses to be added next spring, Thody said.

The project won't be finished for another year, however, because the grounds crew must wait for the contractors to complete construction, he added.
