

Knowledge developed through Mini-U

Mini-University offers over 300 permanent student affairs employees an opportunity to supplement their knowledge in areas they may be especially interested in, according to Daryl Swanson of the Student Affairs Staff Development Committee which sponsors Mini-University.

Swanson said that 204 registrations were received for the 12 classes that began Dec. 2 and will continue through Dec. 20. He said originally 13 classes were offered, but the minimum number of registrants was not reached in one class, so it was dropped from the schedule.

Swanson said this year's course offerings feature a diversity of subjects and the increased use of resource people from the Lincoln community. Some of the courses relate directly to employment or personal life, while some relate to both. The class titled "Rape," which is taught by members of the Lincoln Coalition Against Rape, has the most registrants, Swanson said.

Class titles

Class titles include "A Visit with the Chancellor," "The American Family Today: Trends and Troubles," "Emergency Health Care," "In the Midst of Life: Death and Grief," "Rape," and "The Personnel Action Form—a Form for all Seasons."

"I am persuaded that our skills are forever in need of sharpening and that our understanding of the immediate world around us is incomplete," Ken Bader, vice chancellor for student affairs said in the course description syllabus for this semester's Mini-University. "In a very real sense, staff development, through the Mini-University programs, offers each of us the opportunity to grow and seek greater professional fulfillment."

The objectives of the Mini-University as stated by the committee in the syllabus were to provide staff the opportunity: to study timely issues and concepts in higher education and student personnel work; to interact with resource people that have acknowledged expertise; to interact with one another; and to learn student personnel management and administrative skills.

Employee participation

Student Affairs employees able to take the course include those in the housing department, Union office, student health, academic services and student development area.

The class has been offered three previous semesters with favorable response from those who participated, Swanson said. During each session of the Mini-University, class evaluations are completed by class participants, and then course offerings are modified according to the responses.
