'History of Sport' popular at UNL

The history of sport is being taught this semester for the first time at UNL.

Professor of History Ben Rader, the course's instructor, said he expected to have about 25 students in the class, but over 100 preregistered.

Rader said he, as well as the History Department was surprised at the popularity of the class. He said it is unusual for an upper division history class to have that many students enrolled.

He said the course deals mainly with ancient Greek sports, 19th and 20th century sport in the United States, and sport in the underdeveloped countries of Europe.

Viewing the role of sport with respect to society will be the main objective of the class, Rader said.

He said sport has an affect on the average person's social patterns, norms, values and sexual roles.

Rader said when the course was proposed, the Women's Physical Education Dept. expressed an interest and promised to have some of their students register.

He said 40 per cent of the class are women.

Rader, who also teaches an American Intellectual and American History survey course, said he will have two graduate students assisting with the History of Sport class.

He said he hopes to divide the class into discussion sections and has plans for guest lecturers.

The course, which can count as a social science general requirement, meets twice weekly for 1 hour and 15 minutes.
