NuStep program to expand next fall

Students who are secondary education majors in business, math, music, science, social studies, speech or modern languages, are required to be in NuStep.

Donald McCurdy, professor of secondary education and director of NuStep, said the program is three secondary education courses taken in a nine-hour unit the semester prior to student teaching.

McCurdy said now only secondary education majors in physical education, art, home economics, industrial arts and journalism are not included in NuStep. By next fall, McCurdy said, art will be added to the program.

The three classes taught in the nine-hour block are 362, learning theory; 321, methods; and 341, principles of secondary education. They are taught by a team of secondary education professors and graduate students.

McCurdy said students in the program are divided into small groups and supervised by a faculty member.

Describing NuStep as a performance based program, he said the program centers around the student as a teaching assistant in teaching education centers.

McCurdy said East High School, and Goodrich and Robin Mickle Junior High Schools are used as NuStep teaching centers.

NuStep, in its fifth year, has 125 students enrolled, compared to 146 last semester, he said.

McCurdy said studies reveal the NuStep program is working. He said students with classroom experience prior to their student teaching have been proven to be better prepared than those who only complete student teaching.

Corrections...

Janet Krause is a counselor at the UNL Counseling Center, not a counseling psychologist as reported in Wednesday's Daily Nebraskan.

There are no Colombian students currently participating in the international agricultural program as reported in Wednesday's Daily Nebraskan. According to Malena Komarek, staff assistant in the International Programs Dept., the 250 students mentioned in the story is the total number of Colombian students that have participated in the program at universities and colleges across the country during the past several years.

Komarek said the largest number of students ever involved in the program at UNL was about 30. She said the last participant in the program left UNL in December. Komarek is not a staff assistant in the Entomology Dept. as stated in Wednesday's paper.
