Five universities studied

NU salaries called lowest

NU faculty salaries are the lowest of five Big 8 schools studied, according to a legislative fiscal analyst report released Friday.

A study conducted by the fiscal analyst's office and published after four days of university budget hearings before the Appropriations Committee shows the average salary for a UNL faculty member is $14,813. The five-school average is $15,618.

Nebraska salaries are lower than those at the University of Kansas, Iowa State University, the University of Missouri (Columbia) and the University of Colorado at Boulder. Oklahoma, Oklahoma State and Kansas State University were omitted from the survey because of deadline completion problems.

All states in the survey area finance higher education with the same percentage of state funds, generally 60 to 64 per cent, the report shows, but Nebraska has a smaller tax base to carry the tax burden. Nebraska spends $152 per $1,000 personal income, according to the survey. An expenditure of $64 per student credit hour places the state fifth among six schools

(Oklahoma added) for which data was available. This compares with $81 at Iowa State and $47 at Oklahoma.

During committee hearings, UNL Chancellor James Zumberge and NU President D.B. Varner stressed the importance of raising faculty salaries to retain high caliber academic personnel.

Zumberge reported the loss of key personnel to the University of Colorado and other schools with higher salaries. The fiscal analyst study shows the average salary at Colorado is $2,000 more than salaries at Nebraska.

Faculty salaries are the number one priority in an $86 million budget submitted by the university to the Legislature, Varner told the Appropriations Committee last week. The university's proposed budget is higher than the fiscal analyst staff recommendations of $74 million and the governor's planned $71 million university budget.

Varner has told the Legislature the university cannot maintain its current level of programs if the Unicameral passes the governor's recommended budget.
