Agencies disagree on 'surplus' money from agriculture institute

By Jim Zalewski

The Institute of Agriculture and Natural Resources at UNL and the Department of Administrative Services (DAS) still cannot agree where an alleged surplus of revenues from crops came from, according to officials from both organizations.

Jon Oberg, fiscal budget analyst for DAS, said he never implied that the Institute of Agriculture was "hiding" money. The money that he refers to must be approved for spending by the legislature or it cannot be spent, he said.

"The Institute of Agriculture has received funds in greater amounts than anticipated," Oberg said. "The approximately $700,000 in question includes spending plans for this year. Only the legislature has the authority to OK the spending of this money."

Doesn't understand

Duane Acker, UNL vice-chancellor in charge of the institute, said he still does not understand what money Oberg is referring to.

"I'm at a loss to make a specific comment," Acker said. "When Senator Marvel asked me about this, I didn't know what he was referring to."

The institute is making no effort to hide money, Acker said, since university fund reports are public information.

"I'm aware of the attorney general's ruling which said the university can spend only the dollar figures in the appropriations bill," Acker said. "I'm also aware that we have revenues beyond that amount."

Approximate revenues

The difficulty in the law is the estimation process that the institute has to go through in trying to approximate revenues for the following year, Acker said.

"In my understanding, the legislature knew there was uncertainty in this process," he said. "I think 'estimated' is the key word in the appropriations bill."

"Any implication that it (the money) is surplus would be misleading and erroneous," Acker said.

Though both Oberg and Acker have expressed an interest in discussing the matter, they have not done so.

No word

"I have received no word from them as of yesterday," Oberg said Friday.

"I'd like to talk with him about it," Acker said. "I'm sure it (the money) is known, but there has been no communication at all."

A larger sum of money has been found at the University of Nebraska Medical Center (UNMC) that was not reported, Oberg said.

UNMC received an estimated $1.8 million of unanticipated funds from Medicare and Medicaid programs, he said.

"The undisclosed income in the university system is primarily at the UNMC," he said.

Dr. Robert Sparks, UNMC chancellor who was questioned at length by the Appropriations Committee during the public hearing on the university budget, was unavailable for comment Monday.
