George Tuck, associate professor of journalism, holds "Prairie Storm," which last year won an exhibition merit award at the national convention of the Professional Photographers of America in Los Angeles, Calif., and is currently being exhibited in Juarez, Mex.

Mexico shows professor's prints

The Museum of Art and History in Juarez, Mexico, is the location of a photograph display by George Tuck, UNL associate professor of journalism.

The display, consisting of 50 color prints made from a black and white or color negative or American Southwest landscapes, nudes and "some people shots," Tuck said.

The photographs were made by a time-consuming process in which high contrast positives and negatives of varying densities were made from a black and white or color negative or transparency. Colored light was then passed through them onto color printing paper.

Tuck said he showed some of the prints to the museum's director while on vacation in Juarez during Christmas. The director "liked them very much," he said, and invited Tuck to display them. The prints are for sale in the museum through April 22.

This is the first time Tuck's work has been shown in a foreign country. Tuck said he is not yet a nationally recognized photographer, but said he was named one of Nebraska's top ten photographers in 1974.
