Public libraries take 'holiday'

Today last for fine-free returns

The Lincoln Public Libraries' "Fine-Free Holiday" ends today. People may return long overdue books without having to pay a fine, according to Charles Dalrymple, library director.

Dalrymple said the purpose of the event is "to encourage patrons to bring back books which have been out three to six months or longer.

"Over the years books are lost, loaned, or misplaced and discovered at a later time. People don't have the money for a fine or are afraid of being chewed out if they return the book that late," he said. What may happen then is that they just decide to keep the book, he added.

Dalrymple doesn't think the problem of overdue books is any worse this year than in previous ones. He said that a Fine-Free Holiday is basically a public relations scheme to make people aware of the library. Dalrymple said that the proportion of UNL students who use the public library is great, but that "there is no bigger problem of overdue books with them than with anyone else."

The library doesn't announce in advance when there will be Fine-Free Holidays, Dalrymple said. He thinks that if they did, the privilege would be abused and people would hold library books indefinitely.

The UNL libraries are not now planning anything of this kind, said Gerald Rudolph, dean of libraries. There may be one before finals, he said.

"We would probably just announce that there were no fines from a certain point until the end of the semester."

Rudolph said the problem of overdue books is small at the university. He has found that, for the most part, students "obey the rules and return books on time."

The number of lost books at UNL libraries is not great, Rudolph said. He added that inventory is only taken every three years and the actual number of books missing at this time is not known, although the problem is not large because there are few requests for books that aren't on the shelves.

Rudolph said many students take a book without checking it out, and return it at the end of the semester. He thinks that the security systems at the libraries may encourage these "almost honest" people to be totally honest, and check out their books.

The libraries try to replace all books that are finally determined "lost," although there are some that are no longer in print and are unobtainable, Rudolph said. He added that there are some books they don't try to replace.

"If the book lost is one written in 1929 on modern farming methods, it is questionable whether we should spend money on the same edition," he said.

Rudolph said valuable books are kept in a separate room to prevent theft. He estimates that the university has 10,000 rare books in its collections. There are stricter regulations on the usage of these, and they may not be taken from the libraries, he said.

The libraries receive appropriations from the state to purchase books, he said. Fine money is also used.
