Professor 'rests' on campus

By Max Holland

With the possible exception of those fellows who go out on the football field, few people today show more devotion to the University of Nebraska than James T. Lees showed in 1926.

For Lees, a Greek professor and provost at the University, chose the campus for his eternal resting place.

The site, near Architectural Hall, is marked by a 580 lb. granite rock which reads: "Dr. James Thomas Lees; He served Well; 1889-1926."

The British-born Lees began his career at the University as associate professor in 1889, after completing his doctorate in philosophy at Johns Hopkins University. In 1919, he was appointed provost, the first in the University's history.

According to Manley's "Centennial History of the University of Nebraska," he was responsible for provost for supervising all teaching programs and registration. He played a large part in shaping the traditions and policies of the University.

Manley writes that a colleague, Prof. Alvin Johnson, "remembered Lees as a dyed-in-the-wool British conservative, a magnificent scholar, and a 'despiser of his time and particularly of anything savoring of democracy.'"

In 1922, Lees was forced to retire because of a severe but unknown disease, according to his letters in the University archives.

He eventually moved to California, where he died in February, 1926. Lees was cremated there, and his wife and Chancellor Samuel Avery arranged a memorial service for May at the University.

It is not clear whether Lees expressed his wish formally in his will, or just to his wife. On May 28, 1926, the memorial service was held, near what was the University library.

A poem by Dr. F. A. Stuff, chaplain of the day, appeared in the program for Lees memorial service:

"...In vain we waited, yearning for your return bowed by the weight of loneliness all men must feel. Now wisely, we turn from tears that burn to this noble tree. Here at your bidding then, we strew the precious contents of this urn."
