

Bicentennial teaching methods emphasize future and past

The meaning of the Bicentennial is as much in the past as in the future, according to William Sesow, director of a summer workshop concerning America's 200th birthday.

"Nebraska at Two Hundred Years" is for elementary and secondary school teachers to find ways of highlighting the Bicentennial in their classrooms.

The workshop, from July 14, to Aug. 1, is being taught by Sesow and Ruth Weatherl of the Nebraska State Department of Education.

East campus book store gets trial run this fall

Students living on east campus will be able to walk across the street to get books this year instead of going across town.

A branch of Nebraska Bookstore will be opened on 35th and Holdrege streets Aug. 13 on a trial basis, said John Wehr, Nebraska Bookstore manager.

The store will be open for three weeks in the fall and again in the spring to test the market and see if there is a need for a store at that

The workshop grew out of experience Weatherl had preparing Bicentennial materials for Nebraska Education Service Units which provide education extras for students in Nebraska's smaller school districts.

Nebraska information
Sesow said materials and information about Nebraska are being emphasized and extensive use of local outside speakers has been made.

"What happened at Lexington and Concord is meaningful but is isn't meaningful to the people who weren't there. To be meaningful we must look at the now—what we are like today and as we look into the past, project into the future," he said.

"There is heavy emphasis on the local environment as opposed to Boston, Mass., which very few children have a conception of what it is like."

Sesow said the workshop encourages teachers to get away from the history-book approach and focus on the present and future.

Inquiry approach
"It's definitely an inquiry approach," he said.

He said there was value in letting the child see how he or she fits into the spirit of the United States.

"It's his birthday too," Sesow said.

Sesow said he is pleased with the efforts of the teachers in his class who have made use of many outside resources, including the library, the bookstores and the state Bicentennial headquarters.

"They've been trying to search out and pull things together using a sophisticated, scholarly approach," he said.

location, Wehr said.

Legitimate need
"We have talked about doing this for many years and think that the students out there have a legitimate need for a more convenient store," he said.

The store will carry books for agriculture, home economics and law. In addition, some basic freshman course books will be available along with some reference books and school supplies.

Taxation, law seminar planned

Taxation and law as applied to business will be among topics at a series of 10 review seminars for accountants to be presented this fall by the College of Business Administration at UN-L.

The seminars, which will also cover such topics as auditing, computers, basic concepts and theory, advanced theory and recent developments, will be conducted by UN-L faculty or by accounting practitioners. Anyone intending to take the Certified Public Accountants test may register for the seminars.

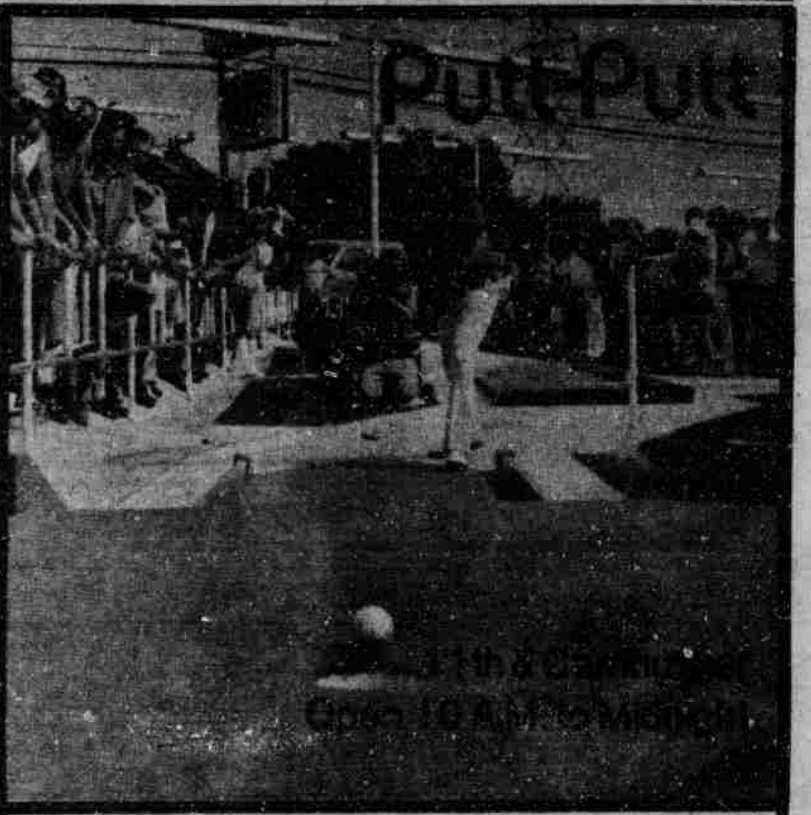

The first series of seminars will begin August 30 and will be held in Lincoln. Some sessions will be held on Saturday mornings, while other programs which require more time for topic development will be scheduled for Friday nights or Saturday afternoons, said Dr. Robert H. Raymond, professor and chairman of the department of accounting at UN-L.

Dr. Raymond noted that questionnaires sent by his department to practicing accountants had indicated that there is interest in holding review seminars in the Central Nebraska area. He said tentative plans are being made to hold a series of seminars in the Grand Island-Kearney-Hastings area.

He indicated that Prof. George C. Holdren of the College of Business Administration at UN-L is in charge of information concerning registration for the seminars.
