Arts center plan offered

A new performing arts center, in the Old Federal Bldg., could fill the needs of the city and the university, according to David Fowler, vice director of the UNL School of Music.

The old Federal Bldg. and City Hall at 10th and P Sts. could be converted into a 2,500-seat theater and office building to provide the opportunity for higher quality performances, Fowler said.

Larry Enerson, Lincoln architect drawing plans for the proposed center, said he "hated to see the building wasted."

"The Federal Bldg. is a good building and is structurally sound. A lot of people want to see the old City Hall retained," he said.

Enerson said the building is U-shaped and the quality of construction within the U is comparable to the outside. The theater could be constructed inside the U, with the old City Hall providing the back-drop for the stage, he said.

Plans for the center allow the outside walls of the building to become the inside walls of the theater.

"Instead of concealing the beauty of the buildings," he said, "we're using it functionally."

Two balconies with lobbies on both sides will be in the theater, Enerson said.

The lobbies will be similar to those in European opera houses, providing enough space for people to move around, Enerson said.

According to Fowler and Enerson, the center will pose little competition to others like it in Lincoln.

It will not replace Howell Memorial Theatre, Fowler said, because of the theater department's continuous need for available space.

If built, the center would be too large for any small studio production, Fowler said.

Enerson said he thinks there would be little competition with Pershing Auditorium. The new center would be too small for many events, he said.

Ivan Hoig, manager of Pershing Auditorium, said he would welcome the new center as "something that is important to the city and "that shouldn't affect our business substantially."
