

Reformatory aid planned

A "People in Prisons" program, sponsored by the Student Y, will begin Saturday at the Nebraska Center for Women in York. It will continue through Nov. 22.

Kathy Smith, Student Y director, said the program will provide Saturday afternoon activities for the residents. The Student Y wanted to do a project with people in prisons and the idea was developed at the suggestion of a social worker at the center, she said.

Smith said the residents at the center do not have organized social activities so the goal of their program is to help the center's residents develop social skills and structure their leisure time so they can adjust socially when they leave.

The program is not designed to teach only crafts, Smith said, but to provide the residents with social experiences and show them the outside world cares. She said the program also will give student volunteers experiences with people that may be applicable to careers and personal growth.

Interests categorized

The residents filled out questionnaires, and their interests were categorized—music, dance, arts and crafts, creative writing, drama and recreation.

Volunteers who have the skills and ability to teach these activities were selected to go to the center on Saturday afternoons. Smith said 20 students have been chosen and more are needed. Three groups of volunteers will go to the center, each for three consecutive weeks, she said. Staff members in York will provide orientation.

30 will participate

Smith said about 30 of the center's 50 residents will participate in the program. The rest are in maximum security or have chosen not to participate, Smith said.

Candy Marshall, a criminal justice major, will organize the volunteers and describe their jobs.

A social worker at the center has encouraged men to participate Smith said, because the interaction will benefit the residents. Interviews for volunteers are being conducted through the Student Y office, 345 Nebraska Union.

UNL police set seminar

UNL Campus Police will sponsor a Law Enforcement Day Thursday from 10 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. at the Nebraska Union.

Representatives from Campus Police, the Lincoln Police Dept., Lancaster County Sheriff's Office and the Nebraska State Patrol will answer questions informally.

"We'd like to give the students and general public a chance to talk to police officers in a nonstress situation," said Campus Police Officer Joe Wehner, coordinator of Law Enforcement Day.

"It will be a public information service meant to improve relations between the public and law enforcement agencies," he said.

Although a Law Enforcement Day has been offered on other college campuses, this is the first program presented at UNL. A similar service may be offered every year, Wehner said.

Information on how to prevent crimes and what to do if a crime occurs will be presented. LPD will license bicycles outside the union.

Scribers, which are tools for engraving Social Security Numbers on possessions, will be demonstrated and can be checked out from Campus Police.
