

Guadalajara exchange architecture students

By Sandy Mohr

"Different." That's Luis Hoyos's favorite word to describe what it's like attending UNL.

Hoyos is one of seven Mexican students at UNL this semester on an architecture exchange program between the UNL College of Architecture and the University of Guadalajara in Mexico. As part of the program, nine UNL students are attending the university in Mexico.

One difference for Hoyos here is that the university he attends in Guadalajara is isolated from the city, he said. The classes are more informal and less structured here, he said.

"In Mexico 90 per cent of my classes are assigned. The rest of the schools aren't open for you to pick a class," he said.

"I look through that green newspaper (the university class schedule) and it's like being in a restaurant. I want that salad, and that salad and that dessert," he said.

Hoyos said UNL is "at least equivalent" with the university in Guadalajara. He said most of his classes are "extremely enjoyable" and socially there's "always something going on."

"In general, I'm having a very good time," he said.

Hoyos speaks English fluently, which he attributes to living on the Mexican border.

The Mexican exchange students took English classes before they came, but apparently not enough for some, according to Prof. Raul Mendoza of the Guadalajara University. Mendoza traveled to Lincoln with the exchange students and is teaching courses at UNL in basic design and graphics.

Mendoza said teaching here is almost the same as in Mexico, and there are no basic differences in the curricula.

"The students ask me if they can stay all year," Mendoza said. The exchange program, in its first year, is only offered for fall semester.

Although W. Cecil Steward, dean of the College of Architecture, said he has not received much direct information, the nine UNL students in Mexico are "doing well and enjoying their studies."

One UNL faculty member, Thomas Laging, is teaching at the Guadalajara university. Both visiting professors are paid by their home universities, and the exchange students register and pay tuition to their home university.

In Mexico the UNL students are taking courses similar to those they would take here—design, structural design, urban studies—and receiving full credit. Steward said they can also take an optional history and philosophy course on Mexican architecture.

The exchange program was started by a friend of Steward's who teaches at the school of architecture in Guadalajara. While attending a conference the two found that they shared an interest in an exchange program, Steward said.

A year ago Steward went to Guadalajara to observe the school's architecture program. The exchange program was approved by the NU Board of Regents in January. The commitment lasts for one more year during which the program will be evaluated, he said.

Participating in the program from UNL are Mark Chavez, James Hotovy, Alex Munoz, Susan Oliver, Diane Reilly, James Rindone and Jean Theisen.
