'Emotional, sensual' history aspects become University Studies drama

When Don Winslow was an undergraduate in University Studies last year, he spent four months writing a play. He said he thought it was a failure.

But a University Studies professor took the time to ask him why he thought so. After answering 30 in-depth questions about playwriting, Winslow said he understood the value of being allowed the "freedom to fail", and learned from his mistakes.

Now Winslow is an adviser in University Studies and director of the departmental Historical Theatre. He said he "recruits people, not talent" and claims "anybody can be a star." This gives students the chance to read without competitive try-outs, experiment and learn, he said.

Historical Theatre provides students an opportunity to fulfill history requirements and blends history and play-action. The theater involves 20 university studies students as well as other university students and nonstudents.

Sensual aspects of theatre

In 1973, Winslow formed the theater which he said takes in the "emotional, sensual aspects of history."

Winslow, who went to work in professional theater in Rhode Island at age 13, said he approaches historical theatre on physical, emotional and intellectual levels.

The physical aspect refers to the actors, costumes and properties, he said. Emotion deals with how the audience feels about the performance, he said, adding that he wants the audience to relate to the historical period portrayed.

The intellectual approach is what the actors, as characters, are thinking, Winslow said. The interpretation of these levels and his own perception of the play help "set the mood about history," he said.

About four performances a semester are scheduled, he said, and each attempts to "entertain and educate without being political." The plays are rehearsed and performed in Henzlik Hall Auditorium and upon request in classrooms around campus.

In addition, Winslow said Historical Theatre sponsors a free British Empire Film Festival every other Tuesday night in Henzlik.

Mark Hoeger, who has a partnership in a family theater in Hastings which travels throughout Wyoming and Nebraska, also directs plays in University Studies.

Hoeger said Winslow are filming George Orwell's 1984 and are directing an original play by Winslow entitled The Last Butterfly. They also are working on producing an Old Glory series.

Winslow said there are many "minds and hearts to draw upon in University Studies, calling historical theater actors a pool of talent, knowledge and energy.
