Over forty and back in college

The UNL freshman said a law degree would help in his business because "the government is down on the cattle-man."

"I can raise cattle economically with a sixth grade education, but I can't beat the government at their stupid games," he said.

Huffman said he considers himself in a rebellious mood and was disappointed because there aren't any radicals on campus or in his classes.

"I haven't found anyone else who is ready to do anything about anything," he said. "I thought they (students) would be more questioning, more doubtful. They just sit there and whatever the teacher says, that's it!"

Comfortable with freshmen

Although he feels the students should discuss more in class, Huffman said he is comfortable with the other freshmen and gets along well with instructors.

"I did have to learn how to study all over again," he said. "And in mathematics, they don't even speak the same language I was taught."

Since starting college, Huffman said he noticed no real difference in his family life. He said he still sees his wife and four children just as much as when he wasn't going to school, but claims his television viewing is "all shot to hell."

'Now I sit and study'

"I used to sit and watch television every night. Now, I sit and study," he said. "It took a while, but now I'm used to it."

Huffman said he will wait until he is finished with school before making any major decisions about his lifestyle, but added that he doubts if he ever will be a practicing attorney.

"I'm not saying we need to change the system," the self-styled "Leftist Republican" said. "I'm just saying we have to watch out."

Workshops help ease students' way at UNL

Most business offices and student service offices are closed in the evenings and over the noon hour.

To make the way easier for returning students, the UNL Alumni Association and Extension Division co-sponsor back-to-school workshops, Johnson said.

The workshops are orientation programs for these students, she said.

Explain procedures

College advisors and admissions personnel explain registration procedures at the meetings and help the student plan his curriculum, she said.

The returning student can pre-register at these workshops and thus avoid mistakes and long lines, said Larry Bundy, director of registration advising.

The next back-to-school workshop will be Nov. 17 at 6:30 p.m. at the Nebraska Center for Continuing Education.

"The university has really opened its doors to the adult student," Johnson said. "More people are realizing that returning to school is possible and that there are not as many hazards to deal with as they may have thought there were."
