Max Larsen, acting College of Arts and Sciences dean

Great Plains Study to be discussed

General goals and objectives of the pro-sed Center for Great Plains Study will discussed Saturday at a meeting called Max Larsen, interim dean of the College of Arts and Sciences.

All interested persons are invited to attend the 9 a.m. meeting in the Nebraska Union. The room will be posted.

Larsen, who will chair the meeting, said its purpose is to determine what people and material resources are available, to plan for implementation of the center and to prepare funding applications.

After the meeting, a core committee will be nominated by various UNL depart-ment chairmen to start planning and co-ordinating the center. Larsen said he hopes to appoint a director next semester who would serve on a "half-time basis."

Larsen developed the proposal which he said, "grew out of discussions with the executive committee of Arts and Sciences."

Geographical advantage
UNL should take advantage of its situation on the Great Plains and apply its expertise to "research and document the heritage for our people," he said.

"Nebraska is the only Great Plains state that has its state university, its archives and a university press not only in the same city, but actually on the same campus," Larsen said. The state also has the advantage of having the College of Agriculture in Lincoln, he said.

An undergraduate major and possibly a graduate program would be offered in Great Plains Studies, he said.

Although he expects research in Great Plains Studies to begin next fall, Larsen said any studies will be based on courses currently taught. He said some courses may be changed and there would be a cross listing of courses in some cases.

Because there will be no new courses immediately, Larsen said, the center can operate without additional state money.

Bicentennial Funds sought

However, Larsen is meeting today with Don Searcy, head of the Nebraska Bicentennial Commission, to request funding.

He said he plans to ask for about $40,000 for the center. The major expenses would be "to release faculty to do some research," he said.

While keeping departmental affiliations, the faculty also would develop new and interdepartmental courses, Larsen said, and he would encourage them to prepare publications from their research.

An annual symposium on Great Plains Studies also may be started, he added.

Larsen said he urges that research begin soon because information on heritages breaks down after the third or fourth generation.
