The missing link discovery.

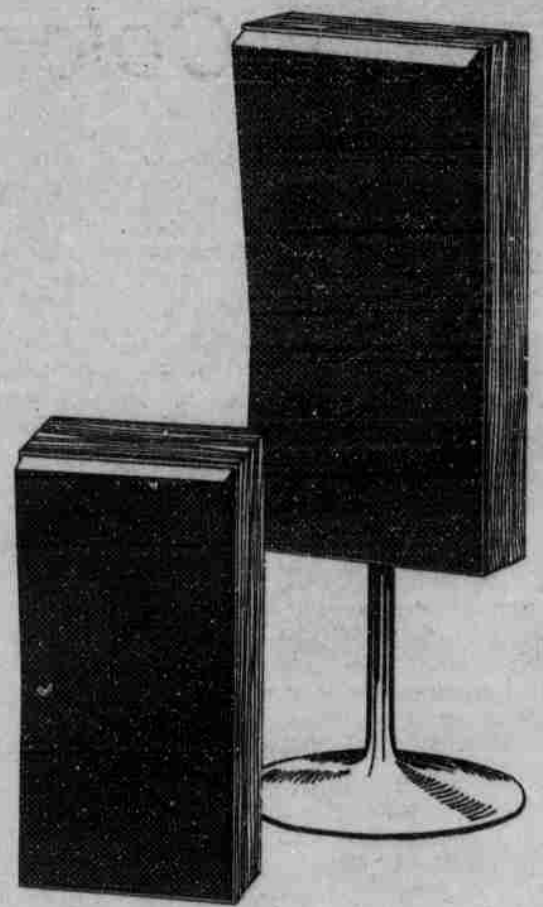

Bang & Olufsen's new Phase-Link loudspeakers.

The first to eliminate phase distortion by providing a compensating signal produced by a new dynamic filler driver. Bang & Olufsen engineer and mathematician, Erik Braekgaard, is credited with having taken the first major step in solving the problem of phase distortion. Mathematically he developed the "missing link" in sound reproduction — the revolutionary filler driver element in the Phase-Link speakers that provides a compensating signal and reproduces a true square wave.

Reproduction of a square wave means that frequency response is wide and flat, that distortion is low, and most importantly, that the phase is correctly reproduced over the entire frequency range. Phase distortion is eliminated and superior transient response is provided only by Bang & Olufsen's Beovox Phase-Link loudspeakers.

Not only has B & O revolutionized audio technology in sound reproduction, but the Beovox Phase-Link loudspeakers signify equally radical changes in speaker cabinetry. The deceptively thin Beovox speaker cabinets are constructed with baffles and backs of an expanded polymer material, which reduces space and maximizes working volume. The slim canted speaker shape and optimum driver placement provide the most accurate sound arrival time. Phase-Link speakers are available in rosewood, teak, oak or white laquer finish.

To fully appreciate the new Phase-Link concept in loudspeakers, you must listen. To fully appreciate the classic simplicity and elegant beauty of these speakers, you must see them for yourself. Stop in Audio Systems and Design and listen to the new Beovox Phase-Link loudspeakers. Truly the missing link discovery in sound evolution.
