

Speaker: farm wives often deciders

Often men do the talking, but women do the decision-making in a farm family, according to Judy Dye, adult education coordinator at the Center for Rural Affairs (CRS).

Speaking at the Women/Speak '75 talk-in series, Dye said the CRA, primarily staffed by VISTA (Volunteers in Service to America) members, deals with rural life problems ranging from the open meeting bill to irrigation.

Dye, who lives on a farm near Walthill, said most farm women play an important part in decision-making, but dislike the idea of "women's lib."

Farm women see feminists as "women who don't have anything to do, are frustrated with their lives" and who do not realize the political implications, she said.

More farm women are getting involved in political positions, she said, but they limit themselves to issues that relate exclusively to the farm.

"Nobody really cares much" about the Equal Rights Amendment because a farm woman's life is centered on the farm and her family, Dye said.

Dye, who is not a native Nebraskan, but a Nebraskan "by choice," said she prefers rural life to urban life. She said she enjoys the remoteness and sense of accomplishment that it offers.

"To me, Nebraska, the good life, is rural Nebraska," she said.

Many people are realizing the quality of rural life, going "back to that little acreage," she said, and deserting the cities and suburbs.

Increases in canning and organic gardening are signs of this "back-to-the-earth" trend, she said.

A panel discussion on "Volunteers, Probation and Female Offenders" will be featured at next Tuesday's Women/Speak series at noon.
