Panel: Bicentennial marks inequality

The nation's Bicentennial also will mark at least 200 years of discrimination against blacks, and problems still exist, according to Tuesday's Women/Speak guests.

After giving a short history of black women, guest speaker Leanette Logan said, "black people's contributions to the Bicentennial should be that of striving for liberty, equality and the right to determine their own future.

Speaker Bobbie Dawkins-Brickhouse, said that the Bicentennial is a reminider that equality and freedom sought by the nation's founders has not yet been reached.

In discussing problems encountered by black women,

Logan said she thought it is hard to separate sexes. Men and women are going through the same problems, she said.

Until the feminist movement grips this fact, they are not dealing with the real issues, Dawkins-Brickhouse raid.

But one audience member said sexism is irrelevent. "If you don't have a job now, can you worry about equal pay?" she questioned.

Logan also said if black women were hired just because they are a minority, more would be working. It is just an excuse some people use to hire them, she said.
