

Enrollment limited in language class

A shortage of professors and classrooms will prevent about 80 students from taking Modern Language 100 next semester, but the course will be offered in the 1977 summer session, said the chairman of UNL's Modern Languages Dept.

David Gitlitz said two Modern Language 100 sections for 60 students each will be taught next semester. No professors will be able to teach extra sections, he said, and existing sections could not be expanded because rooms could not accommodate more students.

Instead, Modern Language 100 will be offered with unlimited enrollment in the first summer session, he said. It will be the first time the course is taught in the summer.

He also said the Modern Language Dept. has requested larger rooms for the class next fall to avoid turning students away.

Gitlitz attributed the course's popularity to students who use it to meet their language requirement after taking two semesters of regular language courses.

He said the course originally was designed to be taken before regular language courses as an introduction to modern languages and cultures.

But Gitlitz said he had no objection to students taking the course to fulfill language requirements, and he will not try to prevent them from taking it after regular language courses.

All sections currently are taught by one professor, he said, but more teachers will be trained to teach the course.

UNL club wins national award

The UNL Agronomy Club has won the national achievement award for the fourth consecutive year at the American Society of Agronomy (ASA) annual meeting in Houston this month.

This is the first time a university agronomy club has attained the top national ranking four years in a row.

Of an estimated 40 to 45 student clubs represented at the conference, only the top six clubs entered the national achievement award competition, according to Bill Siefert, UNL Agronomy Club president. Siefert was elected president of the student section of ASA.

Clubs in competition for the national award are judged by club activities, participation and contributions to the national newsletter, Siefert said. The club activities are summarized in a book that each club assembles and submits to the judges.

The first place club receives a $100 cash award, which is donated annually by Mr. and Mrs. William Colwell of Chadron, said Agronomy Prof. Lowell Moser, an Agronomy Club adviser. Moser attributed the club's success to the cooperation and involvement of its members.

"Because of good leadership and, more importantly, a lot of students who have worked together, the club has put together a well-rounded program which other students in the nation may not have been able to do," he said. According to Siefert, there was less participation this year than in recent years at the Houston conference.

Siefert estimated that 60 to 65 Agronomy Club members are active in recreational, educational and promotional activities. Any student who has taken at least one agronomy course is eligible for membership, he said.

UNL Agronomy Club members also brought home honors in individual competition. Al Unger of McCook took first place in the speech contest. Nineteen competitors at the conference each drew an envelope containing their speech topic and were given about six hours to write the speech, he said. First prize was a $100 cash award.

John Fischbach of Lincoln finished fourth out of 20 entrants in the essay contest. He was awarded $70 for his essay on automatic irrigation systems.

Pat Waldren of Lincoln and Fischbach took fourth and fifth, respectively, in the photography contest, which involved preparation of a slide show and narration. Waldren's entry won a $25 award. Fischbach received a certificate for his presentation.
