Job availability depends on area

Although 12 per cent more Teachers College graduates found teaching jobs in 1976 than in 1975, Lee DeJonge, director of Teacher Placement, said he does not think there are many more teaching jobs available.

DeJonge said he thought students were getting more advice on which areas of teaching were overcrowded. He said there is great demand in some areas of teaching and students are going into those fields.

"Saying that the teaching field is overcrowded is like saying the price of all fruit is high because oranges are expensive," DeJonge said.

The areas of social studies and physical education are crowded, he said, although teachers in industrial arts, math, general science, high school special education and agriculture are in demand.

DeJonge said Teachers College enrollment increased 80 students this year after a steady decline since 1970.

One of the problems in counseling students is that they do not get to the students who transfer from Arts and Sciences College in time to tell them which areas are overcrowded, he said.

Teachers College students also are advised to have dual endorsements (majors) where arts and Science students are not, DeJonge added.

Another reason that Teachers College graduates do not get hired is "they restrict themselves to a certain area," DeJonge said. He added that this is often the case with married couples.

DeJonge said surveys taken at June graduations show that about 10 per cent of the graduates go on to graduate school, one percent go into the military, and two per cent do not plan to teach.

Students are counseled in jobs other than teaching that they can get in their field, he said. For instance, DeJonge said, an endorsement in Business Administration gives the student an automatic secretarial job opportunity.

DeJonge said he thought the image of UNL provides some help in getting a job since the Teachers College has a good program.
