Poet uses experiences to tell truths

By Sharon Frohner

Audre Lorde, who calls herself a "black woman warrior poet," said all a poet can do is use her own experiences in her writing.

Lorde, a teacher of poetry at John J. College of Criminal Justice in New York, also teaches poetry classes at the Poets' Center, conducts workshops, and does readings around the country. She has traveled in the eastern United States, Africa, Mexico and Russia. Lorde gave a poetry reading Monday night at the Nebraska Union.

She has written two books of poetry and was the co-winner of the National Book Award for Poetry in 1974. Lorde also was poetry editor of the Amazon Quarterly. Lorde said poets use their own experiences to tell greater truths that make emotional bridges between peoples' experiences. She said her own experiences are those of a black woman and she does not consider being black and a woman a limitation.

"It does not remove me from the human race," she said. "It adds to it. It's not a restrictive categorization; it's an expansive categorization."

A writer for 30 years, Lorde said she tries to illuminate the world from her position and share with people who have totally different experiences. She said her poetry has grown and changed somewhat, but it still reaches the emotions first.

"Poetry moves through feelings," she said. It is subversive, because it causes people to feel something they think they should not feel, she said.

She said this suppression of true feeling puts all people at a disadvantage.

"Women in general are not supposed to really feel their own feelings. We're supposed to feel what we've been told, and that's the sign of our inferiority."

"That's why we're the 'weaker sex.' Men think and women feel. They (men) respect feelings, but they don't want to do it. It's a double bind," Lorde said.

Lorde also said she believes people should use every weapon possible to preserve the earth, which she said is dying.

Poetry is such a weapon, she said, and part of her function is to urge others to become aware that they can help the earth survive.

She said people have function and power, and they must choose how to use it. People must define their wants and needs, Lorde said, and try to fulfill them in a way not oppressive to others.

"You have a responsibility to speak up," she said. As an example, Lorde compared the acceptance by students of a professor's unsatisfactory teaching methods with the unquestioning obedience of the Nazis.
