Students, animals to get new home

UNL veterinary science students as well as cattle and pigs will have a change of surroundings this semester at UNL's East Campus.

The veterinary science dept. has completed its move to a new $8 million Animal Health Research Center, a four-building complex located on the northeast edge of East Campus.

Funded by the 1974 Nebraska Legislature, the buildings include the Veterinary Diagnostic Center, Animal Health Research Building, Veterinary Basic Science Building and the Animal Holding Barn.

Veterinary Science Dept. Chairman Earl Dickinson, who recently replaced retired Marvin Twiehaus, said the old buildings, built in 1920, were "tremendously outmoded and substandard."

"It (the move) gave us the opportunity to expand our research work studying diseases of Nebraska livestock," Dickinson said. "We are better equipped and can upgrade our teaching."

The program expansion included the addition of five new staff members, he said.

Cattle, pigs and other animals are housed in the complex so students can experiment with various livestock diseases, he said.

Most of the old four-building Veterinary Science Complex, will be torn down, according to Bob Pazderka, NU capital construction coordinator. Two of the buildings already have been removed, one will be demolished soon and the fourth will remain until a decision is made, Pazderka said.
