

Another college may be catching CBA's disease

The College of Engineering and Technology is showing symptoms of the same epidemic that hit the College of Business Administration last year and the housing dept. this fall—overcrowding.

Although the diagnosis has not been confirmed, George Hanna, dean of the college of engineering and technology, said the dept. is considering limiting the college's enrollment.

He said the enrollment is already higher than last year, but definite figures will not be available until later this fall.

Hanna said the problem stems from the lack of faculty members and resources to take care of the increase in students. After exploring several methods of limitation and talking to the college's executive committee last week, Hanna said he will present the problem at a faculty meeting next week.

Meanwhile, Hanna said he is waiting for an estimation of the number of students turned away for use in his faculty presentation.

According to Hanna, the students who pre-registered are generally all right as far as getting in the right sections. He said the transfer students are the ones hurt by the crunch.

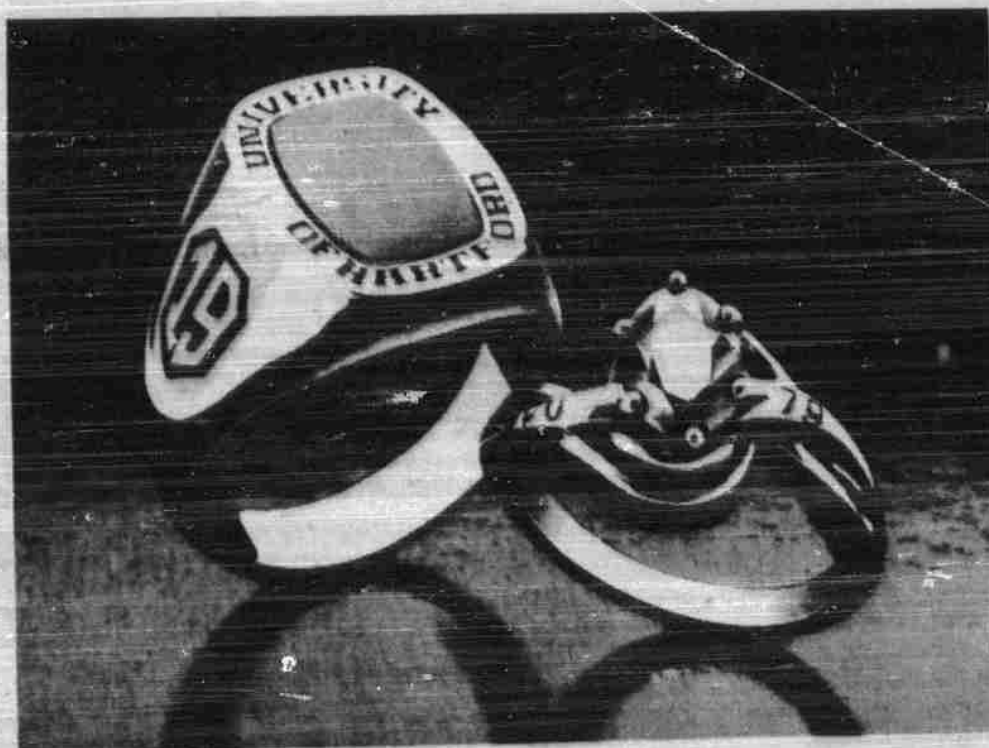

The only cure for the college's overcrowding seems to be the amputation of part of its student body, he said.

Hanna said the alternatives open to these students include working on other requirements, leaving the college or leaving UNL.
