

Searches to stop at Friday concert

Discussion concerning the search and seizure policies of UNL officials, campus and city police at concerts in the NU Sports Complex apparently has ended in a compromise.

Last week, the Nebraska Civil Liberties Union (NCLU) had threatened to file suit in district court questioning the constitutionality of those policies.

NCLU said it will not file suit over alleged illegal concert procedures before Friday's Crosby, Stills and Nash concert.

"If all things go well, we'll probably not be filing anything period," said Robert B. Creager, a private attorney for NCLU.

Attorneys for NCLU have approved a "directive of sorts" to university police stipulating "there will be no wholesale or routine inspection of purses, handbags, bundles or persons," Creager said.

However, the policy released later by Miles Tomeraasen, vice-chancellor for business and finance, said no parcels, packages, knap sacks, athletic bags, bundles or recording equipment will be allowed in the arena sections of the Sports Center. Patrons will be asked to leave such articles in their cars or check them in before the concert, he said.

However, UNL authorities retain the right to take such constitutionally permissible measures that may be required to enforce the law, he said.

Tomeraasen also said alcoholic beverages and possession of controlled substances are forbidden at the center.

Tomeraasen said the reason for these policies are to "insure the safety, comfort, and satisfaction of all patrons and performers and to protect the investment of the citizens of the state."

The policy is the result of complaints received by NCLU that person's attending last month's Fleetwood Mac concert were unlawfully searched for alcohol and controlled substances, he said.

Creager said "the policy will pass constitutional scrutiny." NCLU now is concerned that it be put in practice, he said.

"We sincerely believe that the university is going to make every attempt that this policy is going to be carried out," Creager said.
