Schwartzkopf said he was "not all that enthused" about the voluntary support of the speakers program. But he expressed confidence that enough funds could be raised this way.

"I'm not all that negative about our ability to attract top-flight speakers," he said. It's up to the students.

We'll find out how much fee speakers mean to the students. Are they (students) really willing to stand up and be counted when they have a clear choice?

Eicher said she is pessimistic about voluntary support of the speakers program.

"We might get funds, but I don't think we'll get enough funds to run the program properly," she said.

One of her biggest concerns, she said is that programming is being cut without reduction of mandatory student fees.

Armstrong, said the question of reducing the amount of mandatory student fees has yet to be settled. If fees remain the same, inflation would probably consume the amount saved by cutting the speakers programs, he said.

A check-a-box method of support possibly would be combined with admission charges to pay for speakers, he said.

"There's just so many ideas that we haven't explored because up until now, we haven't been forced to," he explained. "I suspect the first year will be more difficult."

There will be fewer difficulties after students and administrators gain experience, he said.

After a speaker is defined, he said, it will be necessary to judge the amount students would pay and the amount to charge for admission. The amount to be volunteered by each student must be large enough to cover costs, but not so large that students would be discouraged from contributing, he said.
