Able-bodied students discover difficulties in wheelchair rides

A dozen architecture design students Wednesday spent the afternoon in wheelchairs in an effort to make themselves and the public more aware of the problems of the handicapped.

Three groups of students traveled from city campus to downtown and tried to enter vbuildings and maneuver through various businesses.

Complaining of sore arms, cramped hands and tired shoulders, Kevin Muchemore said that by being "handicapped" for the day he "gained knowledge that cannot be gotten from a book."

He said he had read the architecture department literature on the problems of the handicapped relating to building design and added "I though I knew a lot about it. But it is a totally different world."

The students encountered a variety of problems. The ramp for wheelchairs on the County-City Building was judged too steep for easy accessibility.

One bar was inaccessible because there was no ramp. A ramp on Centennial Mall was blocked by snow and the group got through only by pushing each other from behind.

Because there were no curb cuts near the Nebraska Union, the group used a drive for vehicles and were told by a policeman that they could be ticketed for that.

Earlier, when Dave Medinger, one of the students, attempted to raise up on a curb without a cut, he tipped himself too far back and flipped over.

The most common complaint was that sidewalks are sloped towards the street making the wheelchairs lean and head for the street. As a consequence, according to Terry McRell, the person has to work the arm on the street side nearly twice as hard as the other.

Traditionally, architects have been more concerned with pleasing the purchaser of the building rather than considering the users of the building, said Jay Garret, architecture design instructor.

He said that by having students experience being handicapped they will become "totally responsive to the ultimate user as well as the client."
