

High school, college students to form political alliance

High school and college students are forming an organization in Lincoln that will attempt to unite students and act as a research and lobbying group for student issues. The political organization will be called the Student Alliance of Lincoln.

Currently, the organization has 15 members, and according to one of its organizers, the membership drive is still on. Mike Lux, 18, 5100 Leighton, said group membership is open. Primarily, students from the University of Nebraska, Nebraska Wesleyan and the four area public high schools will form the alliance.

"The Student Alliance will basically work together on common issues," Lux said. "Students need to be a part of the decision-making in city politics and education, especially with the issues pertaining to students."

Lux said a few of the organization's goals include improving the guidance system, especially at the high school level, and getting voting representatives on both the Board of Regents and the school board. Another goal is to research and initiate action on student issues.

"We will be acting as a lobbying group, trying to get students' input into city and educational decisions," Lux said.

The organization plans to endorse candidates in political elections and to send questionnaires to the state's political leaders.

Amy Satterfield, 17, of 2937 N. 57th St. said the Student Alliance will differ from high school student councils and the university student governments by being politically active with the city government. She also said the bimonthly meetings will give college and high school students a chance to unite and form opinions on issues.

The Student Alliance still is in the planning stages with no elected officers or set membership. Lux said a September meeting is planned for all interested.
