Course analyzes learning methods

If you've ever been curious about how you learn, discouraged by traditional class structure or mystified by a new teaching method, a class offered by the University Studies department may be for you.

University Studies 100, Learning Analysis is a three credit, pass-fail course. It was designed to help students understand their own style of learning and their reactions to different teaching methods, according to Royce Ronning, course coordinator.

"We want to make students better consumers of their own education and make more rational decisions about choosing their classes" he said.

Ronning said the course is taught by four instructors and will expose students to different learning methods.

Ronning teaches the first segment and said it would give students a brief introduction to human learning and provide them with a sense of how they learn.

The second segment will be taught by William Seiler from the speech and communications department. It explores games and simulations as a form of teaching. These techniques emphasize learning through participation. Students will use structured games and simulations to help each other learn to communicate and to develop their style of learning.

The third segment will be taught by Dan Bernstein, of the Psychology department and uses the Keller Plan.

This learning method is essentially self-taught and allows students to progress at their own rate. The material covered will include personal motivation and the conditions which influence each individual's performance.

The fourth segment will be taught by English Professor Roger Welsch. Welsch will lecture on Nebraska folklore and explore the lecture as a teaching form, medium.

At the end of the semester students will evaluate each teaching method, Ronning said.

Gene Trani, assistant vice president of academic affairs said the program is partially financed through a federal grant. He said similar courses are offered at UNO, Kearney State College, Chadron State College, Doane College and the College of Saint Mary's.
