"Tenk you veddy much," he says and walks off, nonplussed. You get the impression that he'll be back... every day... forever.

There was once a silent movie star named Harry Langdon, a strange little man who wore an eternal look of bewilderment. Andy Kaufman manages that same appearance, one of total innocence and vulnerability, an odd little creature seemingly unable to cope with the world but somehow managing to do so. Watching Andy Kaufman work is a little like watching a child walk across a busy city intersection. You feel sure he's going to get hit by a bus but miraculously he makes it across.

If the show's producers want a sure thing, not an act of providence, to ensure its success, they should use Kaufman more in the episodes.
