Future for photography...

uses tons of film each year and that is increasing. The creativity of video tape means that photography is not going to be limited. The film techniques are improving and giving us more tools to work with," said Tuck.

Read was strong in his feelings of hope for the future of photography. "I think right now there is a rapid growth of photography as a medium of itself. It has in the past suffered an inferiority complex and has followed the habit of the painter." He went on to say, "I think that there are those who approach it as a medium of art for what it can do rather than trying to make it approximate another form of art." We've become more sophisticated as to how to read photographs and I should hope that we will become even more sophisticated as how to read them."

The three all have their own tasks that to them are of the most important concern, or a philosophy which is a key to their work.

Summing up

"Photography is interesting because it is so easy. It's easy to make a photograph but think how hard it is to make one that you can call your own," said Read.

Read then went on to talk about consciously putting something in a photograph to make it have your signature. "The viewer needs to know that there is an intelligence behind the camera."

Tuck said, "I'm not an artist. I prefer to think of myself as a visual communicator because I am trying to communicate ideas. I want to have control on how people perceive what I do."

Young finished by saying, "Getting down to a very basic philosophy that I have as far as photography in education is concerned—is to teach a person all you can teach him about the tool and the mechanics and then let him use his creativity."

Thus the question of photography in the field of art is still a debate and obviously ambiguous. As Young said, "Maybe only time will tell us the truth of what is art and what is not."
