Although removed from Ireland, Sean Rothery's accent and tales of tradition take him back to his homeland.

Irish...

His first book, he said, was about the everyday buildings of Ireland which he calls the "architecture of the people."

Americans are much more appreciative of the type of architecture his books deals with, he said. He defines everyday buildings as homes, courthouses and stores.

He said Americans will fight for a 1920s building, while the Irish consider tearing down the ruins of a tenth century Viking city.

Destruction of the Viking city was a big issue when he left Ireland five weeks ago, he said. Before he left 15,000 people had marched down the streets of Dublin to protest a new office building, to be constructed next to the ruins, he said.

Full of history

Rothery said Ireland is full of history which is preserved in the buildings of the country. Many times it is unconscious, he admitted, but there is a feeling of security to a structure that has observed hundreds of years of change.

Buildings begin to take on personalities, he said. The personalities of the buildings and the atmosphere add to the character of cities, he claimed.

For example, he said, Amsterdam has a casual atmosphere and is a city that seems to welcome anyone or any idea.

He described Dublin as "seedy and rundown" but still showing definite character.

Rothery said Dublin has been described as containing the "relics of old decency" but is being ruined by insensitivity.

Tourist attractions

The history of Ireland is one of its attractions on the tourist market, he said. The country has been swarmed with tourists as people begin to forget about the violence in northern Ireland, he said.

Since the memories of the violence have faded, he said tourism has increased.

Rothery said tourists are helping his cause in preservation of the historical buildings of the country.

"Tourists do not want to come to see office blocks," he said.

Tourists also bring money into the country, and Rothery said that people listen to money before they will listen to reason.
