

Race...

Continued from page 14 warned. Actually, the hills banked gently like semi-sloping plains. After dragging along for two miles, they seemed to jut steeply up and down.

Unless you're a runner, it's hard to understand how the mind centers inward as your body stretches along with the ground. I can look at the surrounding scenery and feel as though I am connected with it, but at the same time, I am a complete unit within myself.

Thoughts get lost. My entire mind was functioning at an unsteady speed, but within an enlarged awareness. I was more aware of the outside world at times, and at others it melted into a rhythmic existence.

MY MIND BECAME filled with an unpredictable drunkenness of air as I tried not to concentrate on my protesting lungs or my faltering knee joints.

All I could do was to keep moving. I kept going. Then, it was over and, with smiles, my friends were congratulating me.

I had finished. My friend was already there, having finished much earlier. Another friend shouted "Yay, Alice!"

A little stunned, I forgot about the physical sensation of my body being torn to its limits during the last stretch of the course. The breeze fluttered slightly and I smiled too.
