Law library closed to some students

By Jim Faddis

The University of Nebraska Law Library will be closed this fall to students not using law materials, according to the assistant dean of the Law College.

Ray Hazen said overcrowding has led to closing the library to those using it as a study hall.

In the past, law students have been unable to use the library because of crowded conditions, he explained. But, the library will be open to anyone wishing to use the law materials in the library.

Instructor Abigail Hubbard said doing law research requires a lot of space.

"Law research is a cumbersome activity. A student needs a large number of books to do law research. Someone doing law research can take up as much space as four people studying," Hubbard said.

Hubbard said that students doing law research need access to a certain collection of books. The law library is the only place offering that access.

Attorneys statewide, undergraduates taking law classes, UNO students, high school students and people researching legal problems all use materials found at the law library, Hazen said.

ASUN President Bud Cuca said that he agrees with the decision to close the law library to those not using law materials.

But, Cuca said, a study area should be made available to students wishing to study late at night.

Cuca said he has proposed that classrooms at the law college be opened for undergraduates to use as a study area.

"This would be a compromise that would be the best of both worlds for the law student who needs to use the law library, and for the undergraduate who needs a place to study late at night," Cuca said.

Hazen said that a decision on Cuca's proposal has not been made.

About 80 students a night not using law materials have been studying in the law library, about a fourth of the library's seating capacity, Hubbard said.

Hazen said law students have complained about not having enough space in the library to do research for a long time.

Previously, a specific area had been set aside for those using the library as a study place, but not using law materials. However, the library was still overcrowded, Hubbard said.

The library is an attractive place to study because it stays open until 2 a.m., seven days a week, and is housed in an attractive building in a good location, Hubbard said.
