The program can be used as an educational supplement by professors who often assign classes to attend speeches, Brown added.

Students have demonstrated a desire for a balanced speakers program, he said, but it has been difficult for UPC to bring big name speakers to campus with voluntary funds.

Brown also said that it disturbs him that people "seem to be scared of the word political."

"Everything is political," he said, citing the regents' pleas to the Legislature for money as political speeches.

"If anyone is hoping to escape politics, they should hop on a plane and go to the nearest mountain."

Cuca said he is concerned not only with the educational quality afforded by the speakers program, but its economic aspects as well.

Since students pay $69 a semester in fees, and $1.57 of that goes to programming, it is important to get as much use out of it as possible, he said and a student fee-supported speakers program would achieve this.

Cuca said he will emphasize to the regents that if the speakers program is reinstated, programmers would strive to present both sides of issues. He stressed that this is a different approach than was used when the regents decided to cut the program.

Cuca would not speculate about the regents' reaction to the request, but Brown said he was hopeful that the board would change its attitude.

"All we ask is that they look at this judiciously," he said.

Woods...

"The thing that disturbs me most in all of the university problems is their unwillingness to inform the public," Chambers said.

Woods was fired in September for taking too long on her coffee breaks and for allowing unauthorized personnel to stay in Oldfather Hall past closing time.

Woods received no warning about the rule infractions before she was fired, nor did she receive two weeks pay that she was to receive according to the university employees' handbook, she said.

According to a report filed by Woods' supervisors, John Marker, assistant custodial manager, and Heinz Matthiesen, custodial supervisor, Woods and her co-workers were under surveillance for two hours on Sept. 6.

Marker would not comment when asked if surveillance of employees is normal procedure.

Woods also charged that her work schedule was changed in that a job that normally required four hours and two workers was changed to three hours and 45 minutes and Woods was expected to do it alone.
