

Graduating teachers get extra certificate

LINCOLN—UNL students graduating with certification from Teachers College have something new being added to credentials being sent to prospective employers.

That "addition" is an official letter from the Associate Dean of Teachers College confirming the student's completion of UNL's integrated program for teaching handicapped students in regular classrooms.

The letter serves as evidence of the four-year evolution of "Project Mainstream," which has been developed through use of Dean's Grants from the Bureau of Education for the handicapped.

"We didn't just create a class," said Donna Aksamit, administrator of the Dean's Grant, as she referred to legislation calling for instruction of handicapped students along with non-handicapped students to the "greatest extent possible."

"Instead we are inserting new curriculum into all our elementary and secondary classes, as well as classes in the History and Philosophy of Education and Educational Psychology and Measurements Departments," she said.

Although planners for the Mainstream Project considered devising a separate three hour course or developing specific modules which would have been added onto existing courses, they decided the way to deal with the intent of the legislation was to integrate the material into existing classes, Aksamit said.

Classroom sessions concentrate on ways handicapped students differ cognitively, physically and socially from other students. Students are learning the necessity of a team approach to developing and implementing programs for the handicapped. They also are being taught skills relating to direct classroom instruction, and pupil monitoring and evaluation.

In order to prepare and implement the program, Mainstream Project staff, faculty and department chairpersons have collaborated with representatives from public schools, the State Department of Education and other agencies and organizations.
