

Love Hall expects some vacancies

Female agriculture or home economics majors who would like to save about half the cost of dormitory living may want to consider living at Love Memorial Hall on East Campus.

The hall is in an unusual situation and has several openings this year. There is room for 49 women, with 46 spots filled, according to Nancy Burkhart, vice president in charge of duties for the hall. More spaces will become available during the spring semester when several residents will move out, she said.

"There are some residents that are teaching assistants that won't be coming back and several women will be getting married," Burkhart said. The hall expects to have about 10 openings for the spring semester she added.

In the past, there has been a waiting list of women wishing to live in the hall. Wendy Buettow, resident adviser for the hall, said she thinks the problem is that people don't know the hall is available.

The hall was built in 1941 with a donation from Don Love. Love wanted students to earn part of their college experience by working for it.

That philosophy allows the women to realize a substantial savings compared to other common living arrangements. The residents do all of their own housework and cooking.

The residents are divided into groups of six or seven women and they divide the duties among themselves every two weeks, Burkhart said.

"There is quite a bit of responsibility involved, especially with cooking," Burkhart said. "Every two weeks the women in different groups change duties. One person will cook, another will clean and some will be given free time," Burkhart said.

Hall residents are working on getting boarders for next fall. "It may be kind of late for the spring semester, so our big push will be for next fall," Buettow said. The residents will try to make high school students aware of the hall, she said.

The openings in the spring will cause problems, Burkhart said. There will be problems getting duties done without having anyone double up, since the system is designed for 49 women. "We're just going to have to have the people here tell others that the opportunity to live here exists," she said.

Love Memorial Hall is different from other coop living arrangements in that all residents are either agriculture or home economics majors. That helps incoming freshmen to adjust to college life and it creates a bond between the residents, Burkhart said.
