Financial problems have contributed to the lowest faculty morale he has seen in his 10 years at UNL.

"Every gain we have made in 10 years is gone," he said.

Although student concern seems to have been centered on faculty salaries, students have been hurt more than faculty by low budgets, he said. Low budgets lead to the resignation of the university's best faculty members, inadequate laboratory equipment, and the elimination of small, specialized classes, he said.

The result is a sort of "psychic poisoning," Lynch said.

Lynch also said the central administration should be dissolved because it duplicates many of the services of the UNL administration and has directed the regents to inadequately divide the budget among the three NU campuses.

He cited figures showing that from fiscal

1970-71 to fiscal 1979-80, UNL's state general fund appropriations have increased 125 percent, compared to a 224 percent increase for UNO, a 314 percent increase for the NU Medical Center, and an 835 percent increase for the NU central administration.

UNL already has its own administration and can't afford a second, he said.

Elimination of the systems structure is the first step to restoring a healthy university budget, Lynch said.

Although he doesn't want to embarrass the university, Lynch said he will continue to agitate for change after the Arts and Sciences faculty considers the resolution.

Unless action is taken soon, it may be too late to solve UNL's financial problems, he said.

"The university is in some ways a creature that suffers from a dietary deficiency. Long before he is dead, he's dead and doesn't know it," Lynch said.

Work-study students urged to work more before break

Work-study students should work extra hours before Christmas to make up for the time they might have worked during the university closing, Dec. 24 to Jan. 4, according to the director of scholarships and financial aids.

Don Aripoli said the closing cuts 40 to 48 working hours for students who planned on earning money for spring semester. However, work-study students can earn the extra money anytime because it has been guaranteed as part of their financial aid program.

Of the 1,000 students on work-study, Aripoli said the closing would affect only 30 to 40 because most students plan to go home during the holiday. But students who live in Lincoln might ordinarily want to work during the break.

"Students who work six to seven hours extra over the next six weeks can earn the money they would have earned if we were open during the holiday break," Aripoli noted.

Although working extra now might pose a burden to some students, Aripoli said they could work at times when their class load is less, such as dead week and finals week.

The director also recommended putting in more hours during spring semester. But the drawback in waiting until spring is that the students won't have the cash in the beginning, he said.

Be an Angel... Buy an Angel

You'll be seeing and hearing "Be an Angel. buy an Angel" around Brandeis this holiday season. Each little angel face will be drawn by an individual with mental retardation.
