"This is so ridiculous, it's not even worth talking about," McDowell said of the university policy that forbids use of state facilities for religious worship or testimony. "The issue is not separation of church and state," he said. The idea behind that concept, McDowell said, is that neither the church nor the state can have authority over the other. The concept has nothing to do with separation of facilities, he said.

McDowell said that his on-campus speech did not contain testimony. Testimony, he said, is when the speaker tries to relate his experiences to another's life. Application is the key to testimony, he added.

McDowell said he relates theology to the way people live. Some people have called him an entertainer and he doesn't see anything wrong with that, he said.

He said the most important element in his speeches is that he do his homework.

While a lot of the audiences to whom he speaks are university students, McDowell also speaks to business groups and professionals. He began speaking when he debated Marxist leaders in Argentina.

McDowell holds degrees in economic theory and theology and speaks several languages. He started law school but decided it was not for him. Because of his background he said he likes to explain Christianity intellectually and because of this, university and professional audiences can be more receptive to him.

McDowell estimated his monthly income at $1,200. Since proceeds from his books and films go into a special fund to cover his travel and office expenses he said his personal income is mostly covered by various foundations, groups and individuals who support his beliefs.

Report shows use of classrooms up

By Michelle Carr

The use of classroom space at UNL is improving compared to past standards but needs further improvement, according to two administration officials.

Ron Wright, UNL vice chancellor for business and finance said nothing will be done immediately as a result of a recent classroom utilization report, but said efforts to improve and update classroom space is a prime concern of the administration.

A report released at the January NU Board of Regents meeting stated that the UNL City Campus used 54.5 percent of its classroom space. UNL East Campus used 36.5 of its space and the University of Nebraska at Omaha used 78.9 percent. The measurement combines the number of hours the classroom is used with the number of seats occupied.

Wright said that a separate classroom use survey is being conducted and the results will be released in March.

Modifications need to be made, he said, because several UNL buildings were constructed with a larger classroom size than is needed now. For example, Wright said, optimism about enrollment prompted the construction of buildings in the 1940's designed to seat 60 to 90 students per classroom.

Wright said some classrooms are "not in the best arrays for students to learn," particularly large classrooms with a small number of students.

Classroom use at UNL is not up to par because of severe problems with classroom space in 1964, according to Robert Pazderka, NU construction coordinator.

Resolving the problem is something "you just don't do overnight," he said.

According to Pazderka, UNL had 21.7 square feet per student in 1964. In 1978, the figure was reduced to 12.21 square feet per student. The best ratio is 10 to 11 square feet per student, he said.

The results of the regents' report showed that UNL East Campus had the lowest percent of used classroom space of any campus in the NU system. Pazderka said the percentages were based on classroom registration and the size of each classroom.

Guidelines for classroom use, which are based on the Western Interstate Commission for Higher Education, are 45 to 85 percent.
