

State vet group supports college

A group of Nebraska veterinarians have formed a committee to support the proposed regional college of veterinary medicine in Lincoln.

North Platte veterinarian Dr. Robert E. Bohlender, committee chairman, said the group was formed to show the public that many practicing veterinarians support establishing such a college.

"We feel that there is going to be a strong need for more veterinarians in the future," Bohlender said. He added that Nebraska has a strong network of excellent veterinarians and the committee's goal is to see that excellence continue.

The group was formed because it believes there is an unfounded indication within the public that practicing veterinarians are opposed to the college, Bohlender said.

The proposed college would serve Nebraska, Montana, North Dakota, South Dakota and Wyoming.

Half of the estimated $30 million cost must be paid by the federal government and two of the five states must agree to provide financing before construction will begin. Nebraska's share will be about $7 million.

All of the state's livestock industries have already indicated their support, he said, along with the veterinarians.

Another veterinarian on the 13-member committee said that even though the issue has been controversial, he still believes the college is needed.

Dr. J.D. Little, of Wahoo, said that many spinoffs, such as research benefits, can be expected from the proposed college along with support for the livestock industry.
