

Nebraska Union to close over Labor Day weekend

A motion to close the Nebraska Union during Labor Day weekend next fall was passed at Wednesday evening's Union Board meeting.

Robert Moline, chairman of the Operations Committee, said in a proposal to the Union Board that the union was not making enough money in sales or getting enough student traffic during the holiday to warrant keeping the building open.

The proposal stated that in 1979 during Labor Day the union made $14 in sales on Sunday and $6 on Monday. In 1980, the union was open only on the Sunday of Labor Day weekend and total sales were $11.08. Union expenses remained fixed during that weekend.

Union director Daryl Swanson said that even on days that the Union is closed, students who need the building for a function or students groups who need to get into their offices would be able to do so:

The board discussed the possibility of using union funds to buy materials for the replacement of the paintings in the South Crib and using a $500 endowment from a UNL alumnus as a reward for the students who would paint the pictures.

"We checked into it," Moline said, "and we figured that it would take about $400 in union funds to pay for the materials."

Union Director Daryl Swanson said that the administrator of the alumnus' estate would have to be consulted as to the stipulations on the use of the endowment, which was given to the union for "the purchase of a piece of needed equipment."

The Operations Committee also agreed to look into how students would be selected to paint the paintings.

Larry Williams, residence director of Cather Hall, was introduced as Vice-Chancellor for student affairs Richard Armstrong's appointee to the Union Board Planning Committee.

Two students from the College of Architecture, Larry Nagaki and Craig Ellis, were announced as new appointees to the planning committee.

John Kelly was announced as the Interfraternity Council representative, and Carrie Christensen was announced as the Pan-Hellenic representative.
