

Husker game could be a runaway

After a great public outcry I am revealing my percentages this week. I had a late September slump last week, hitting only 27 of 36 for a .750 mark. For the season I'm 71-19, a .790 pace. Now for this week's games.

In case you haven't heard yet, Nebraska plays Penn State this week on national tv. This should be the Huskers' toughest game to date but that's not saying much. In fact, this game could turn into a runaway too.

Penn State has looked impressive in their first two wins, but against Colgate and Texas A&M, it's hard not to look impressive. The fact is, while the Lions have a decent running attack, they still don't have a very good quarterback. And they're going to need one because it's doubtful that they'll be able to run much on the Huskers.

It's hard to see how the Penn State defense will be able to slow down the Huskers, especially Jarvis Redwine. The Huskers have too much speed for the Lions to be able to contain them the entire game: Nebraska 35 Penn State 17.

Stanford at Oklahoma. There's really no rational explanation for Stanford's loss to Boston College last week. Games like that just show how absurd life can be.

It would be even more absurd if Stanford upset Oklahoma. Don't laugh. Two years ago Stanford lost by a touchdown to the Sooners. Stanford's big advantage is that their strength—the passing game—matches up well with the main Sooner weakness on defense—the secondary.

Also the Sooners are often their own worst enemies in early games because of their habit of fumbling five or six times a game. If they don't have too many turnovers, Oklahoma should hold on and edge the Cardinals: Oklahoma 28 Stanford 24.

Louisville at Kansas. Louisville fans don't have much to cheer about these days. Darrell Griffith has gone off to play for the Utah Jazz and, even worse, Phyllis George Brown has yet to lose all of the weight she gained while she was pregnant.

Of course, that doesn't have much to do with who will win this game. This should give you a good idea of how bad Louisville is: The oddsmakers have made Kansas a 12 point favorite. When you consider the fact that Kansas has scored only 10 points all year, this is nothing short of remarkable.

For Kansas this game is a last chance to get their offense going before they have to face the most difficult part of their schedule. And, after all, it's not often you are able to score more in one game than you have the entire season: Kansas 23 Louisville 6.
