I generally think well of college students, but there is one point on which I am at odds with them. They adopt puppies and kittens during the semester and then abandon them at the end of the year. What happens to the animals then? They survive maybe two months at most-less in the winter. They are mauled by larger animals, killed or crippled by careless drivers, shot by thrill-seeking cowards or they just simply die of starvation because they have lost the skill to hunt because of their domestication. Their deaths are ugly and painful-and needless if you take the responsibility of owning a cat or dog, then don't let them run wild. Put a collar and I.D. on them so if they are lost, someone will return them to you. I have seen more animals hit by cars because of their owners' stupid-Guard your animal against misfits. If your tomcat or dog roams or strays, have it neutered-the same goes for the female animals. This is not cruel; studies, in fact, show that neutering prolongs the animal's life. The cost is less than an evening out with beer and pizza. YOUR ROFFLER' HAIR CARE CENTER Some pointers: 1. If you plan to abandon your animal at semester's end, give it to the Humane Society.
