Piranha...

ing up green balloons," he said.

While all this may make McDermott and company seem like modern-day Romans looking on as the lion destroys the Christians, McDermott reports that the Grover disclaimers have been few or silent.

"They all come down to see him, I mean, who would want to watch an angel fish for example? All they do is float there," McDermott said.

"At least with a Piranha you have some action now and then. Hell, the funny part is that people will say how gross it is, then they'll stick around to see him eat."

McDermott knows of at least one instance when a piranha owner made the mistake of handling the fish during a water change.

"He thought the fish barely got him. But then he looked and there was blood everywhere. It's a challenge though, keeping from getting bit."

But, Grover may be on the trading block soon unless someone supplies the financial aid to cover the piranha's supply of food. Goldfish cost about 20 cents each and a steady diet of brain shrimp wouldn't be as fun to watch, McDermott said.

"I would like to keep him, but 40 cents a day adds up. It's surprising how many he can go through so fast. He's already eaten his worth," McDermott said as he grabbed a goldfish from a bowl and dropped it into the aquarium.

As usual, a small crowd had gathered in the room. Two hours later, Grover decided it was dinner time and subsequently devoured the fish. During that time, only five of the original 13 spectators had left and one of them returned.

"If he gets more famous, I just may have to keep him. He may starve a day or so, but I'll keep him," McDermott remarked.

Grievance...

Young asked for ASUN's help on the matter. The UNL maintenance department later formed a Concerns and Communications Task force to deal with similar problems.

Wessels said although Young was not a student, situations similar to his could occur with students, and a grievance committee is necessary to deal with them. Other UNL employees and faculty have their own grievance committees, she said.

All undergraduate student employees and graduate students who are paid by the hour may use the grievance procedure, Apel said.

Grievances based on alleged discrimination will be heard only through the Equal Employment Opportunity procedure, which is handled through the Affirmative Action Office, Apel said.

Grievances based on the hiring practices of students' employers, wages, hours, terms and working conditions, will be heard through the grievance committee.

Apel said the grievance committee is meant to be used as a last resort. Students should first present their complaints to their immediate supervisors and discuss the problem. If no agreement is reached, a written complaint can be submitted.

The student's immediate supervisor should then send a written response to the student. If the student still feels that the grievance has not been taken care of, he should submit it to the appropriate dean, director, or department chairman, who will then investigate the grievance and send a written reply to the student.

If the student is still not satisfied, he may appeal by submitting the grievance to the director of Scholarships and Financial Aids, who will convene a grievance committee to investigate the matter.

The committee will consist of three members—a student, an office and service staff member, and a managerial-professional or faculty member. People in the unit where the student submitting the grievance is employed are exempt from serving on the committee.

The committee will make a recommendation on what should be done to the vice chancellor for student affairs, who will make a final decision.

Information on student employment and copies of the grievance procedure are available at the Financial Aids Office, Room 113 Administration Bldg.
