

Baby-boom...

Nor did Americans have to worry about the darker implications of their consumption patterns at home. For years we could afford to throw money at problems without consideration for the human failings—greed, bigotry, selfishness—that fostered them.

Too few public figures ever hold constituents responsible for their behavior. Nevertheless, Americans ought to have learned from events of the last year that the rest of the world isn't ready to let the United States revive the old, rather inequitable arrangement.

The meaning of this new social order ought to be amply clear to members of the baby-boom generation, who may be inheriting an anachronistic legacy.

In the 1980 presidential campaign's least talked about speech, Jerry Brown told a dozing Democratic National Convention audience last August: "As a small minority of the world's population, we must live by our wits, think better and work harder... We can invent new ways to live better. We can learn to place quality above quantity and caring above consumption."

Like Mike Mansfield, Brown has been warning Americans about the consequences of resting on one's laurels and not adapting for the future. While bad habits may be difficult to overcome, the sooner such modifications occur the better, and the less painful the transition will be.

And the less likely our hunger for personal gain and worldly superiority will have left us in the cold 10 years from now.
