Psychologist, UNL professor debate homosexuality issue

By Chris Welsch

In an emotional debate Thursday on the psychological and social aspects of homosexuality, James K. Cole, a UNL psychology professor, took the stand against Paul Cameron, a Lincoln psychologist.

Cole began the 1½ hour debate in the Nebraska Union, defending gay rights and opposing Cameron's anti-homosexual stance.

Cole questioned Cameron's claim to being an expert on homosexuality, and accused him of violating the American Psychology Association's code of ethics.

"Cameron has referred to homosexuals as 'an infectious tribe, who are lethal and dangerous to themselves and society,'" Cole said. "He has manipulated figures, used obscure language and used appeals to fear and emotion to prove his point."

Cole had statistical tables handed out to the audience from an unpublished Kinsey Institute report that Cameron used to support his views. Cole pointed out what he called fallacies in the way Cameron had used the tables.

"Cameron has used arbitrary statistics with non-representative samplings and uncontrolled variables," Cole said.

Cameron defended his use of the Kinsey data and stated the reasoning behind his anti-homosexual stance.

"The question at hand is whether or not our society should change to accommodate homosexuals," Cameron said. "I admit the evidence we have is weak, but can we question the judgment of our forefathers?"

"The writers of the past in the western world have deemed homosexuals as less-than-desirable citizens," he said.

The Kinsey data shows that homosexuals are more likely to be unhappy, suicidal and criminal, Cameron said. Homosexuals take a disproportionate number of virgins and recruit more young people than their heterosexual counterparts, he said.

Cole ended his argument with a plea for homosexuals to be viewed as people and as individuals.

"Homosexuals are people - some good, some bad. They appear in all walks of life and cannot be viewed as monsters," Cole said. "I am not a heterosexual; I am not a homosexual. I am not a bisexual or an asexual. I am not a stereotype."

Cameron said Cole's statements are irrelevant.

"Homosexuals are people; that is irrelevant," Cameron said. "Hitler and Stalin were people too. Nice people can do less than pleasant things."

"We have some hard choices to make from insufficient data, however I don't think the law should protect homosexuals nor should we allow more to generate through these laws," he said.

Lincoln police to auction bicycles

The Lincoln Police Department will sponsor an auction of unclaimed bicycles Saturday at Lincolnland Towing, 410 W. P St.

The auction will begin at 10 a.m., and will also include unclaimed miscellaneous property, according to Doris

King of the LPD property department.

The bikes that will be auctioned off have been recovered within the city of Lincoln, including UNL campuses.

The bikes are kept for 60 days before being eligible for sale, King said.
