UNL classroom use on par with average, below UNO

By Lorna Nissen

A study released Friday by the Nebraska Coordinating Commission for Post-secondary Education shows that use of classroom and laboratory space at UNL is lower than that at UNO.

But when compared with other universities across the country, UNL is doing fairly well, said Bob Pazderka, director of facilities, management and planning at UNL.

Based on a norm of 30 average hours per week of classroom use, UNL was shown to use classroom space an average of 25.37 hours per week and UNL an average of 36.73 hours per week.

The higher use of classroom space at UNO is attributed overall to the fact that the university is forced to make the best use of its space because of overcrowding, said William Fuller, executive director of the commission in an article printed Friday in the Lincoln Journal.

UNL has been shown to be both higher and lower than other classroom use averages in the Big Eight and Big Ten schools in a separate comparison conducted by university officials, Pazderka said.

Pazderka said the University of Kansas uses classroom space an average of 34 hours per week.
